in any case, you can notice that 432 hz was used in bach's time in some places but mostly for tuning instruments, and it was later replaced by about 400 hz. pythagoras knew the reason why the fifths were diminished in his tuning system, and he found it in the stability of the celestial bodies. the planets, or the spheres of the heavens were to be set to a frequency of 432.5 hz and thus they always stayed in the same place as the earth moved around them. this was the reason why 432 hz for music was called astropical. musicology suffered for a long time because, i think that a combination of myth and scientists has made it hard for people to accept that things are not as they seem. we tend to prefer the explanation that makes sense. not all explanations are true, but maybe one of them is. this is the wisdom of science, which is difficult to accept for a lot of people. pythagoras probably knew that the planets had to be in the same frequency, and that people sometimes heard 432 hz in church. he also knew that the melody of the planets was beautiful and harmonious, and that humans could feel the power of the celestial bodies with their ears. in a famous piece by beethoven the planet jupiter is in the third position, which coincides exactly with 432 hz. you can also find bach's organ toccata and fugue in d minor at 99'54" and there is a b♭b♭c in the bass for a total of 432 hz . here is a list of all the planets and the frequencies that these planets are set to. music obviously is very important to our daily lives. today we use music to feed our emotions, to bring new ideas into our lives, and to make us dance or make ourselves laugh. but did you know that the ancient egyptians had a special connection with music ? did you know that they even used music as a symbol of happiness?
