in the uk biobank substudy, all cognitive test scores from the cognitive tests shown in table 1 were converted to z-scores using distribution reference values from the internal dataset within the uk biobank analysis framework. the resulting domain z-scores were then summarized as an overall cognitive domain composite z-score; the average of the z-scores within each cognitive domain was also taken. participants were classed as having a high versus a low level of cognitive impairment within each cognitive domain depending on where their z-score placed them relative to the median of that domain. international normalized ratio (inr) was used as a measure of concomitant medication of warfarin. all warfarin users were reclassified as being either on or off warfarin at the time of cognitive assessment. warfarin users were then further classified as taking a low-, medium- or high-intensity warfarin dose (20′ mg/day). inr values were ln-transformed. we assumed these covariates to be missing at random. stroke is defined as an acute event characterized by a rapid onset, defined as symptoms lasting 24 h in the absence of other explanation. the cerebral infarct type (ischemic, hemorrhagic) and subtype (lacunar, large artery or small artery) are determined during hospitalization based on clinical and radiologic findings. short-term niv trials rely on an acute increase in gas exchange. to obtain consistent improvement in gas exchange, a sufficient increase in minute ventilation is required, which is only possible with a reduction in the natural rate of minute ventilation. as patients' inspiratory drive increases during niv, it is not possible to decrease respiratory rate to achieve niv without associated hypercapnia. 463

decision trees are tools for assisting in the analysis of situations that are determined to be too complicated to be solved with a simple answer. they are commonly used in medical decision-making and other areas of data analysis such as multimedia processing, automated reasoning, and computer vision. comparison of evidence from experimental and quasi-experimental studies, whether or not they have randomization or a control group, is called quantitative evidence. comparison of observational studies with cohort data is called qualitative evidence. where a direct comparison is possible, quantitative evidence dominates qualitative evidence. where the direct comparison is not possible (for example, where the evidence includes both experimental and observational studies), or where the evidence is limited (for example, when there is only a single case study or when there is only one quasi-experimental study), qualitative evidence may dominate. 654 fibromyalgia is a complex disease, and there is no definitive test for the disease. however, it is generally described as a syndrome of widespread pain and fatigue that is associated with psychological distress. the cause is not known. 656 one study suggested that specific hla genes may be associated with fibromyalgia, although this link has not been replicated in other studies. 657 incorrect strategies lead to errors in visual perception which can have a lasting effect on a person's ability to see clearly. research on basic aspects of eye-hand coordination (e.g., stimulus-response mapping) suggests that there are individual differences in the neural processing of visual stimuli, and these differences may affect the patterns of motor activity that are used for responding to an object. 298 5ec8ef588b
