one of the best ways to hide something is to hide it in a place that other people rarely look. the same thing can be said about house hacking. for example, some people might store a laptop in a cabinet in the closet. however, if the laptop is plugged in, it's still in the home, and people could see it. so, instead of putting it in the closet, the hacker would plug the laptop into a power strip in the bedroom. this way, the person would not know that it was hacked. if the person ever checked the laptop, they would find that it was powering down, and the hacker would be in complete control of the computer. almost all computers use the windows operating system. on top of that, windows is the most popular operating system. windows is open source and is free to use. in order to hack a windows computer, all a hacker has to do is download a simple program from the internet. the hacker can then use the computer's internet connection and search for other computers using a particular operating system. for example, the hacker could use a program called a keylogger to spy on the user's keystrokes and search for computers running other operating systems. if the hacker is interested in a mac or linux computer, he or she could do the same thing. all of these hacking methods are not perfect, and some of them are illegal. the main problem is that once a computer is hacked, the hacker is in complete control. the hacker can record all of the user's keystrokes, search through the user's emails, listen to phone calls, take control of the user's computer, and many other things.

hackers who do not have access to a computer could also build a dictionary. the most important thing to remember is that these people are not trying to break the system, but rather are just curious about what they might be able to break. if they are not sufficiently motivated, they will need to spend at least a month for them to have any noticeable effect. this is not a problem, since my site is monitored by real people who take care of security matters. in addition to these general trends, weve also intentionally created a situation where the most common kinds of attack are easy for anyone to perform. let me illustrate with the following scenario: an unscrupulous physician might want to check the data that underlies certain pharmaceuticals sold by a particular manufacturer. she decides to check the 10 year-old electronic medical charts for a patient who was prescribed the drug on aug 15, 2012. she finds that the prescription was given to the patient on aug 4, 2012, and discovers that the patient was prescribed a different drug for the same condition. on one of his own websites, she can just as easily check the patient data from 2013 to see when the patient was re-prescribed the drug he was using 12 years ago. data, we know, is no longer a monopoly. the fact that some information is even unencrypted makes no difference to hackers - especially when theyre already in the networks weve built. thats why a recent survey found that 58% of australian and canadian medical records were unencrypted. the only requirement is that the data be there for the hacker to find. since healthcare is so regulated, weve made our systems easy to hack. 5ec8ef588b
