To assess the usefulness of the complement C3a-desArg as a biomarker of early response to bronchodilation in asthma. We performed a double blind, placebo-controlled study of seven stable asthma patients receiving the long-acting β_2 -adrenergic-agonist formoterol (24 μg bid) for 48 h. Spirometry, blood samples, and forced oscillation technique measurements were carried out at baseline, 24 and 48 h after the last dose of the study medication. C3a-desArg levels rose 30 min after the last dose of formoterol, but did not vary after placebo. The C3a-desArg decrease 24 h after the last dose of formoterol was correlated with a milder bronchoconstriction determined by spirometry. The C3a-desArg decrease in 24 h was correlated with a decrease in the impulse oscillation resistance and mean elastic modulus. An increase in C3a-desArg levels in response to bronchodilators correlated with early responses in patients with asthma.
