All macros are 16-bit C-like. The programming style is C-like. The name is an acronym of Keyboard Macros. Each macro can render a keypad or keyboard into a graphic image, and these icons can be used in a graphic interface layout, by simply including a background picture and the graphic icon image in a graphic interface file. Other features include: Graphic font types and sizes can be changed easily by using an editable text box and a macro function. Macros can be extended by users to add their own glyphs. Macros are easy to compile using a command line compiler, and can be edited using standard text editors. More info, including a comprehensive user manual, is on our web site.
