I did not find it that smart except in Photoshop Elements. When used in conjunction with color correction and some of the image enhancement tools in Photoshop, adaptively blending images can provide a high-quality, low-dynamic-range look to photos that would otherwise look underwhelming or unnatural. As you can see in the image above, images that lack sharpness—shown in the dark areas of the leaf (left), the water droplet (center), and some of the sky (right)—tend to appear flat. By contrast, the tonal balance (the brightest areas of the leaf, droplet, and sky) is often a natural result of the natural tonal gradation of the natural world rather than anything an artist did. With no sharpness difference, there's no focal point to create a screen line. Our eyes are less accurate to the sharpness in these areas because they naturally average out the sharpness to create a flattened blur of the edges. It's as if we have added a hand-held vignette to the image to soften the edges. That's why creating a screen line takes less effort and typically looks cleaner. Without sharpness difference, the gradient filter feature offers the same benefits a screen line offers, but with different results. The same areas of an image that appear evenly toned to the eye appear as a gradient in Photoshop. The closer the [baseline] is to a [bright] [dark] [high] or [low] [color], the sharper the image will appear to the eye. Similarly, images that lack sharpness will look less sharp. This is why it is less accurate to change the exposure of an image with the camera-lens and Color
