Electrotransport of hydrophilic acidic molecules into biomembranes is of great interest for applications in pharmacology, biotechnology and drug delivery. We have investigated electrotransport of a peptide, known to cause cell damage at high concentrations, at a constant negative potential of -50 mV. The evolution of electrotransport in poly(3-alkylthiophene) (P3AT) based planar bilayer lipid membranes (BLMs) has been monitored by amperometry. For the investigation, peptides containing 5 amino acids were synthesized. The application of current pulses did not cause morphological changes in the membrane. However, a considerable decrease in the concentration of peptide in the membrane was observed. From the results of a pulse optimization we conclude that the application of a pulsed current of a single polarity of 1 nA or higher for 100 ms (in the case of the peptide with the sequence XNPLKM) increases the efficiency of peptide transport up to 9 orders of magnitude.Rise in one of the most harmful viruses in the world The rate of cases of the Dengue fever virus have risen steadily, writes Chris Askew The virus – known as 'Zika' – has been associated with cases of the neurological disorder called microcephaly in babies and more recently with a rise in the number of cases of the eye disease, called ophthalmia neonatorum, in Brazil. More importantly, the virus has been linked to Guillain-Barré syndrome – a rare disorder affecting the nerves that causes weakness and paralysis in adults. The rate of Zika virus infection in the Americas is estimated to be much higher than that of dengue fever. In the Americas, the latest World Health Organisation (WHO) estimates show that there were 14,700 new infections in the Americas in 2014. In 2013, there were about 2,600,000 cases of dengue in the Americas. However, dengue has been experiencing steady decline in its incidence while the incidence of Zika has been rising steadily, particularly in Brazil. Roughly 30,000 children have been born in Brazil with severe birth defects after their
