The first decade of the new millennium saw many changes. Mobile phones became smaller and cheaper to own, and along with that, their cost. Broadband Internet connections became faster and smaller, which made it easier for people to upload and download data to their computers. The first decade of the 21st century saw a major shift in the way people share information. Newsgroups, especially in the technical arena, became popular. These newsgroups have hundreds or even thousands of users that communicate in the online newsgroup, and subscription to the newsgroup is required to access and read its contents. A newsgroup can contain messages posted by users or can be automatically generated by software (which is a common use of newsgroup software). These systems are also used by Internet providers and corporate communications departments to send out newsletters, employee announcements and other messages. Companies offer a number of services to enhance this kind of communication, and an internet service known as Newsfeed is the most powerful. It collects data from newsgroups and other sources and displays it in a web page that shows only the newest messages. As time passes, new messages are added until a new web page is generated that shows the newest messages. As with the Internet in general, most of these newsgroups are written in plain English, often for a general audience. Users of these newsgroups can communicate, debate, and offer their opinions. However, they can also create newsgroups for specific purposes, such as providing help for others, asking for help, or discussing a particular topic. These newsgroups are also read by many business people and IT professionals, as they are useful resources for getting
