Lightroom 5 includes the same major feature updates found in prior releases, but the workflow is still cumbersome. You can manage clips, access features by shooting mode, and extract settings from previous versions. This is done using the Export/Import feature, which works well for moving images to other programs and back again. One thing to consider is that the version numbers for Lightroom 4 and Lightroom 5 were equivalent to the numbers for Photoshop CS5 and Photoshop CS6, respectively. For example, Lightroom 5 is version 1.4.2 and Photoshop CS6 is version 1.6.1. This would make it possible that Lightroom 4 users upgrading to Lightroom 5 will be able to directly import the files they're using and that are stored in their Lightroom 4 library. However, the The curation feature is useful for you to flip through and showcase your images and not have to name all of them. If you wanted to go after a top 10 or 12 images, you can thumb through the curation. It does take a little time to go through all of the images but it is a safeguard. I would never leave a high level guest session on. I would like to see the ability to add information about what the image is to display in non-standard ways. For example, I would like to see the ability to have a placeholder for an old 4mm or 5mm lens with the text that says this is my old idxus lens. This information doesn't have to be visible if it is relevant to what is being reviewed. It is not clear how the lens data is used. For example, adding the "old idxus 33-135 f/4-5.6 lens" elsewhere in the review would be more useful.
