Heparin/heparan sulfate-like proteoglycans (HSPGs) are thought to function in the growth and differentiation of cultured cells by mediating the binding of growth factors and morphogens. We have cloned a novel human cDNA that encodes a heparin-binding protein expressed predominantly in cultured adult kidney tissue. The cDNA insert contained a 691 base pair open reading frame, encoding a 185 amino acid protein, which is conserved between mice and humans. The predicted protein lacks a signal peptide, suggesting that the heparin-binding protein may be involved in the process of regulated secretion. However, a carboxyl-terminal domain of 56 amino acids suggests that the protein is localized in the Golgi apparatus. A phylogenetic tree based on the amino acid sequence suggests that the protein has a higher degree of sequence similarity to the mouse NPTL-1 gene. Northern blot analysis shows that the gene is expressed in a wide range of human tissues, with the highest levels detected in adult kidney. The gene was mapped to chromosome 21 by radiation hybrid mapping and the chromosomal locus was narrowed to 21q22. The developmental expression pattern of the gene was analyzed by northern blot analysis of a panel of different mouse tissues ranging from embryonic day 11 (E11) through postnatal day 10 (P10). The gene is expressed from E11 to E14 and then increases in expression until birth, with most of the mRNA observed in E18 kidney, spleen, skeletal muscle, and lung. "Let me talk to my doctor." "You okay?" "I'm fine." "I'm all right." "Hey, I'm an emergency room doctor." "I don't have the skill to deal with this." "All right." "I'll do it myself." "Hey." "Oh, my God." "You're not gonna make it." "You're not gonna make it." "M
