In order to investigate the effects of male rat scent perception and its influence on male fertility, adult Sprague Dawley rats were housed in separate cages, their cage mates were removed and they were divided into four groups: (i) group A was exposed to female rats and group B was exposed to male rats; (ii) group A was not exposed to female rats but group B was exposed to female rats; (iii) group C was not exposed to female rats but group D was exposed to female rats; (iv) group A and C were exposed to female rats for 4 weeks. Group B and D were exposed to male rats for 4 weeks. Following exposure to females for 4 weeks, all rats in group A and group C had normal pregnancies and deliveries of normal-sized litters (12.0 +/- 2.00). However, group B and D rats exposed to female rats for 4 weeks showed significantly smaller litters (10.0 +/- 1.8 and 9.0 +/- 1.8, respectively). Furthermore, when males in group B and group D were exposed to female rats for 4 weeks, these rats did not have a normal mating behavior. All males became inactive after being exposed to female rats for 4 weeks and did not attempt to attack any female. In contrast, all males in groups A f988f36e3a
