This is a great review on the new version of photoshop. I am excited to see all of the changes in the program. Would you mind if we added it as a "starter kit" to the photo education app in our iTunes store? Adobe's Lightroom 5 is based on the previous Luminance 3, which was itself a major update to the previous 2 versions. The new version has rewritten the whole engine, including the new engine. It also has new features such as the ability to automatically organize your files based on the time, date, color, and keywords you enter. The new version also starts faster. Notably, Lightroom 5 also adds new features that were formerly missing from the iPad version including the ability to rotate, crop, and fix perspective distortion. The new version also offers an improved skin tone editing engine. The biggest downside to the new version is that it no longer follows the previous user-friendly interface style. The new "Classic" interface is dustproof, complicated, and altogether a step back. The new version of Lightroom 5 has an expiring collection dialog, meaning you will no longer have to manually delete old collections. The file system is a massive improvement, allowing users to make special adjustments to the "same" folders with ease. As far as I am concerned, compatibility with some of the newer Camera RAW files has increased a bit because Lightroom 5 uses Camera RAW 2.8 (and only that version of Camera RAW) so it can be expected to handle some of the DR4, DR5, and DR6 files. The upgrade is fairly seamless. Once the new update was installed, the old version could no longer be opened. Photoshop has now improved support for different version of Lightroom. None of the changes in Lightroom 5 look like a step backwards in terms of features. Some of the changes do look like a step in the right direction. For example, you can significantly reduce the size of the file you are editing, which is a big step in the direction of the simplicity of data storage. Additionally, one of the annoying little things about older versions of Lightroom is that the metadata panel displays its settings vertically. Lightroom 5 does away with this. Much of the functionality in the program has been improved. Even the brushes have been cleaned up a bit. The biggest question mark revolving around Lightroom 5 is the fact that it came out of beta testing to be immediately upgraded to the full version. One of the other big missing features in the app is the ability to "record video" from the Metadata panel while you make adjustments. For some reason, this was only available in the iPad version of the app, and is still missing in the desktop version. I'm sure some features will be missing in the default version, but the new version of Lightroom does a better job at cross-compatibility with other programs, which is a step in the right direction. On the other hand, the iPad version of the app still does not support Camera RAW, XMP sidecars, and camera-specific metadata settings.

For browsers not listed in the documentation, we recommend the installer version . It's not just Adobe apps that you can easily take to the web, but creative tools, too. And for the web, that's important—because the open web has truly become a destination for information, information about people and places, news, and more. We're committed to bringing Adobe's technology to new audiences and experiences, but that requires new platforms to be built. In 2019, the WebAssembly portal was created to give Adobe the ability to bring our most complex apps natively to the web in a universal and open way. Previously, Adobe's apps were only available as stand-alone desktop applications; now, developers can use WebAssembly to connect Adobe apps to a broad set of capabilities, including running in the browser. And in 2020, we started our journey to bring Photoshop to the web.
