This issue relates to Window Management. The first thing you need to understand about Photoshop Elements is that you cannot simply create multiple windows. You have to create new documents. As stated in the first graphic up, we may have only one window at a time. If we open an image, we can close that image and move to a different one without it affecting our other open files. So if we have a number of images we are working on and we decide that we would like to move away, we just have to keep all of them open. One of the features that has made Lightroom an excellent tool is the ability to work with images in the RAW-format as well as other files. However, in development versions of Lightroom they added an auto setting (tag) feature that reduces the quality of the image's compression when you export it directly to jpeg rather than let it be saved as a raw file.

Now, when I see this new option, I feel as if Adobe has ignored the reactions of users who want to have full control over the quality of their images and therefore opted to stop supporting them. This choice is different from what I was expecting. I really doubt that most users who use the auto setting tag option choose to have the images compressed to a low quality in order not to take up too much on their hard disk. Anyway, the development team did what it did. Since it has been incorporated in Lightroom 5.4, the option to use the auto option has been removed.

The other option that was added was the possibility to set the compression quality when editing images. Both of these options can be found in the Edit menu.

"Today marks an important step forward for Adobe Photoshop," said Shantanu Narayen, Adobe president and CEO. "For the first time ever, Photoshop's features are more tightly integrated with both the browser and Adobe Sensei, which allows it to work across many devices, including both Mac and Windows, and to provide end-to-end image editing and collaboration capabilities right from Photoshop." The Adobe project was inspired by Adobe Presenter, which helps people easily capture presentations and PowerPoint files on regular notebooks, cameras and smartphones. It lets photographers and 2D designers compose their presentations wherever they are and then share their work directly to a timer. Photoshop for the Browser (beta) is an extension that enables users to use Photoshop from within the browser, such as through web pages on Facebook, Google and The New York Times. Users can shape images, draw lines and even apply AI filters to an image within the browser without leaving Photoshop. "The road map for Photoshop to become natively available on more web-based platforms starts with making editing images in the browser possible,” said Keith Hedin, Adobe’s vice president of Photoshop. “We’ve already developed a robust native API for Photoshop that is designed to closely support Photoshop’s existing price aware features. Now with the redesign we’ve created a more streamlined and user-friendly interface that is anchored in familiar tools and aspects of Photoshop, making it easier than ever to manage and get images to the people who need them.”
