Is there any way in which I can create an entirely separate C DLL with a large input and large output? E.g. something that could return a large number depending on the input size. The input would be some size that it couldn't fit in memory (e.g. unknown). Specifically, I would like a platform-independent way to write code that executes on a remote server. The C library must run on the server. Also, the output must be sent to a socket. The C function must be called from C#. I'm using .Net 4. A: You should be able to achieve what you want by creating a COM object in C#, having it call to the DLL, and having the DLL read from the socket. You can accomplish this using System.Runtime.InteropServices.ComTypes and System.Runtime.InteropServices.ComTypes.NativeMethods. You can do all of this in your C# code. You would be coding it as if the DLL was written in C#. There is a good example of doing all of this on the MSDN page for System.Runtime.InteropServices.ComTypes. You can find further documentation for the C COM objects on this MSDN page. EDER and combined hydrolysis in specific phosphatases. The dual effects of the EDER inhibitor R59949 on catecholamine release. R59949 was recently introduced as a specific inhibitor of phosphatase-2B. It has been reported that the compound inhibits the enzyme with greater potency than other tested serine-threonine phosphatases. We show here that R59949 inhibits catecholamine release evoked by electrical stimulation in the perfused hypothalamic
