So imagine I have a blog, with 50 comments, and I only want 5 out of them to be approved. Is there a way to say, "check this box, and 4 of these 5 are good, but no more," so that the ones I don't want to approve, don't get approved? Is there a way to get a notification email with details on which of the 5 comments that weren't approved is the most common and which ones were approved, or most problematic for reviewers to the point it's giving the spam button, and the least problematic ones? Value of pointer not changing while using same memory I was reading a book named Computer Organization and design and came to know that The hardware doesn't know the size of a memory cell. It just stores the whole memory as a single word (in fixed-size memory chips) or address (in memory-mapped I/O devices). So why the same memory is used in different systems for variable-size data structures (such as vectors)? The answer was that it is because of pointers. I am totally confused with this concept. Please explain it. A: If you have a buffer of data that is arbitrarily sized then you need to use a pointer that points to a generic location (such as a char or int). Your char and int data probably uses 1 byte or 4 bytes and you need to accommodate all of that. This means you need to guarantee that your pointers are always pointing to a valid memory location. If your data is of a fixed size such as int or unsigned int then you just need a fixed size buffer.
