While Thalasingar is directing the .Q: How to wire in a divider receptacle? I want to replace a nearby receptacle with a double-gang box. The original receptacle has two receptacles inside, and the two outside receptacles appear to be for branch circuits. The problem is that the old box only has two screws. The box is a single gang, and each of the two outside receptacles is surrounded by a solid panel. I am under the impression that the screws are for installing the actual receptacle, and that the actual receptacle cannot be installed without removing the screws. What's the best way to install a new box like this? I was thinking of putting an outside face plate that has a face plate screw in each of the slots. I think that would make it much easier to re-use the box when I install an actual receptacle. In the meantime, is there any way to wire up the box in the meantime? A: The screws will be a minimum. Personally I would suggest new box if two screws only. But as long
