This is how my workflow is. I start my day by importing and organizing my raw pictures. For this, I am using Lightroom 5. I import my pictures in folders named after their respective geographical locations or the day of the week. I then import and process the pictures into DNG and JPEG files using Adobe Camera Raw directly in Lightroom. Once I am done working on the pictures, I remove or move them into their respective folders. I then do a little editing here and there to apply presets. I save the edited JPEGs as DNG files and move them into a subfolder as well. I also create a copy (RAW) of the DNG file for Lightroom. Once my edits are done, I move the edited JPEGs into a final folder and then export them as PNG files using Adobe Photoshop. Once the pictures are finished and saved, I then move them into their original folders. I also trigger the sync of the metadata via Lightroom and process the images on the desktop. I then apply a batch of presets. I save the retouched images as DNGs and move them into a final folder. I also export them as PNGs. For my "final" touchup, I use Lightroom 5's Photoshop Plug-in to edit and save the pictures directly into Photoshop. Once I export them using the PS Plug-in, I move them to a final folder. I have been doing this for quite some time. It took some practice to get the workflow smooth, but it has now become my daily workflow. The DRM is off, so I can share anywhere I want. The process is quick and simple and even if I make a mistake, I don't have to go back to the beginning. This workflow makes me use Photoshop every single day. I select my workflow, my folders, my presets, my resolution, and my order in which I process images. I don't have to think about it, it just happens.
