Lightroom has seen its interface completely redone for the first time in about 2 years, and it may pay to be preview the latest version before the next update. It is a really nice program, I must say. It is also cross-platform, and so one doesn't need to worry about which OS he or she is using at the time. I have developed an excellent workflow in Lightroom, and would happily recommend, say, 10-15% of my collection to use the program. Photoshop has several new features, and is now more efficient in a couple of ways. I really don't know if I have mentioned this yet, but file loading times have markedly improved since the early versions of this program. This benefit comes at no small cost to performance, though. Photoshop is considerably less stable than it used to be, especially when it comes to changes in the color space being used by the program. It's not as dumb as this, and the next section will describe how the program deals with color when naturally ACES or D65 color space is specified. A noticeably redesigned user interface offers a customisability that I have so far seen in the features it provides. I like how it seems to support selective merging and automatic avoidance of flattening. The user needs to quickly locate specific adjustments, and Lightroom 5 seems to offer just that. Chapter view still has its benefits, but more importantly it provides for a much more intuitive view of the exported image. The exported image is significantly faster in many ways, thanks to the use of the intelligent and efficient Engine, which is developed and managed by Adobe for its products. This will certainly help the users of the latest version of Photoshop, especially those who work online a lot.

However, even if you're an expert designer using the newer interface, you could still find a few problems when you start using the program.
