I work at a large magazine and it is a nightmare trying to keep all images and other content in the same PSD, for both web and print. In the past two years, I have come to rely on the wisdom of Photography Blog and continue to be surprised at how many of you have issues with this new workflow. I keep saying to myself, "I'll take another look at Photoshop and just maybe the problem will go away."
It hasn't, and it hasn't gone away.
Now, for me, this would be a dream workflow. Admittedly, my computer skills are much less than my artistic skills and I have access to images that most of you normally don't -- so I can't really judge what migration from Photoshop to Lightroom would be like.

However, I am getting where many of you are with regard to using similar or even identical source files in projects that span both web and print platforms. Let me tell you why I think this is important: I truly believe that the hard-won combination of image editing and layout functionality that Adobe offers at a reasonable price and high level of quality is an essential part of the online team's success for any publication that is serious about creating a web presence. If you were to remove those tools from the equation, I am certain that the number of people who have to offload those kind of tasks to Web designers and others would go up, not down.
Furthermore, as we go forward, I'm going to be spending a lot more time than I am now with Web & Print designers. I'll be explaining to them our need to have the same overall look for a given page in both print and the web, with a little bit of tweaking so we do not look like the same design again every time the site is updated. The only way I can really get that across is by working in Photoshop. That's what I've been doing.
