For those who have seen Photoshop for years, you'll especially enjoy new additions such as the Content-Aware tool, a new brush tool, and even Adobe Camera Raw. The program is also more powerful, with faster preview times and more memory-efficient rendering; AI functions have been added to many brushes, and you can now snap to grid on the RGB or CMYK color palette. I really like working with Photoshop every now and then. For a general purpose image editor and editor with some special purpose features I think I'll stick with Photoshop. Although the software's interface is very intuitive and its functionality just right for the tasks it does, if you're completely new to Photoshop, you'll feel much more comfortable with these other image editors. I like ColorCube, but it is not for the beginner, it's a program cowboys to use. It is a very powerful program nevertheless. With Camera Raw you can focus on your skills and let the software take care of the rest, or you can let it show you where you go wrong if you don't like the result. Photoshop is ideal for images with many layers, history and masks. It's not necessarily a better way to edit photos - and the lack of a grid view after using Lightroom doesn't bother me - but it's a better way to organise and display them. I love it! Photoshop is something special. If you are a graphic artist, web developer, any kind of digital artist, there is a piece of software that will exceed your expectation, easy to learn, productive and great for graphic design. And once you learn it, you can't live without it.
